Since its foundation in 1981, SADD has impacted the lives of millions of students, friends, parents, school and community leaders, law enforcement officials, and others interested in empowering teens. The strong connections that these groups have with SADD has resonated into a brand that people identify as a remarkable experience in their work to empower teens to become leaders and role models to others in their communities and across the nation. Because vehicular crashes remain the number one killer of teens, until statistics change, our core focus will remain on traffic safety. However, students across the country have asked for help in addressing other emerging issues that are important to them, such as substance abuse, suicide, depression, bullying, violence, body image, and so many more. SADD does its best to equip students with the best, most effective resources so that they are able to take the lead on which issues to address in their communities.	Every Wednesday
